

XMM-Newton supports currently nine joint programs and observes about 30% of its high priority targets simultaneously with other facilities. With this amount of joint observations, XMM-Newton is leading in the organization and enabling of multi-wavelength and multi-messenger observations. Naturally, the offered joint programs receive very different response from the scientific community. The talk reflects on the challenges to indicate joint programs between different facilities and gives focus to the scientific aspects of joint programs.